CONCLUSION

Applying Marx's framework to the current agricultural protests in Europe, it's evident he would interpret these as a manifestation of the proletariat's resistance against a capitalist system that favors the wealthy elite and agribusinesses at the expense of small farmers and workers. These protests underscore the broader impacts of capitalism on laws, politics, and societal organization, maintaining a status quo that benefits the rich while challenging the working class. Marx would see these movements as crucial steps toward dismantling capitalist structures and envision a future where decisions about production and resource distribution are made collectively, ensuring community needs supersede profit.
